

Adalida Baca

Paul Livingston

Sense and Possibility

February 27, 2020

Response Paper February 27th, 2020

Deluze's The Logic of Sense was super helpful in understanding the paradox which arises in language. For instance, he first explains that a denotation is a relationship of a proposition to an external state of affairs. I took this as a statement (which can be true or false) that is attached to some reality/ thought/ object in the real world also known as a state of affair. This state of affairs is individualized meaning that it's built on particular instances of relations, bodies, qualities, etc. We see denotation when we attach words with specific images which explain or represent the state of affairs.

Moreover, he explains manifestations as the relationship between the proposition and the person speaking the proposition. This means that manifestations are things like beliefs and desires which communicate with the proposition, and desires and beliefs are conclusions drawn from effects seen. Desires is the internal causality of an image, and belief is the anticipation of the object whose existence must be produced by an external causality. Thus, making denotation possible. So, when denotation moves to manifestation, a displacement of logical values is represented by the Cogito which means that we switch from true and false to veracity and illusion.

Furthermore, he discusses signification as looking at the elements of a proposition to signify conceptual implications to other propositions. He goes in depth with this to say that implication is signified as the thing which points to the relationship of the premises and the conclusion. Therefore, it is considered the affirmation of these implications. Thus, making these terms linguistic signifiers for understanding.

Now the paradox comes in because the conclusion is detached from the premises if and only if you add other premises from which the conclusion is not detachable. He then goes on to talk about homogenous and heterogenous signifiers, but I didn't understand this part. Despite knowing that, I am able to see the circular picture between the denotation, manifestation and signifier.